Rendering your services to one organization for a long period automatically makes you a vital member of that company. The fact that you have stuck on for that long and the company has retained you, certainly means that you have emerged as a loyal and hardworking employee.

Working for years at one place will definitely enable you to see the various changes and developments the company has gone through or is still going through. The infrastructure, the total number of employees, the management and last but not the least, your boss! Hence, having your boss changed or a change in authority; brings upon you a new responsibility. You have to familiarize your new boss to your team.

Language bar?

Is the language bar deterring you from being at your confident best while hosting an introductory meeting with your team and your new reporting boss? Well, even if you're just slightly under confident and need a little brushing up; worry not!

Let us bridge the language gap:

Situation: Your reporting manager has been transferred to another city; a new manager has replaced him. The responsibility entrusted to you by your head is to introduce your team to the new manager.

Arun: Good Morning Team, Thank you all for gathering here this morning. The main reason behind conducting this meeting is to introduce and welcome a new member to our company.

Applause...

Arun: With a strong experience of eight years in the industry, she has seen in and out of marketing and has travelled different countries spreading her knowledge and expertise in the field. Please welcome marketing guru Neeta Malya who is going to head our marketing team.

Neeta Malya: Thank you for that extravagant introduction. I'm floored by your introduction.

Arun: Thank you so much Ma'am. We all have a lot to learn from you.
