For a business owner or entrepreneur, one of the most difficult tasks faced by him/ her is dealing and tackling customers who have passed their due dates. 1. Don't delay in drafting the reminder: Many a times, customers might delay the payment for lame reasons such as forgetting about the money involved between the two parties, or thinking that the payment has already been made. These are the instances that take place majority of the times and hence, it is crucial for you to write and send a gentle and friendly reminder.

2. Clarity & Conciseness: Keep the English language simple and to the point. Understand the fact that the letter is about a delicate matter and hence, refrain from using overly flowery language as doing so is bound to affect the clarity of the letter. 3. Take the detailed route: Yes, your letter is about informing the person that he/she owes you money. However, it is vital for you to specify the exact amount and date the money was due on to express the delay in time and underline the fact that your company maintains a great professional record till date.

4. Give information galore: Be proactive and inform the customer of the interest measured on the amount owed. You could also include a revised invoice attached to the payment reminder. Include all the updates and changes in the payment reminder to ward off any undesired confusions.

5. Mention the consequences: Using a little firmness in your words, outline and spell out the consequences they will have to face if the nonpayment continues. The consequences vary from company to company, so check your company laws and describe the subsequent steps that could be taken against the individual.
